"Olga was always the one who was supposed to make it out. She was the smart one, the pretty one, the one who was going to get married and have a family. I was the one who was supposed to stay home and take care of our parents, the one who would never leave the neighborhood.

But Olga is dead now, and I'm the one who's left holding the pieces.

I'm sitting in the kitchen of our childhood home, drinking a glass of rum and staring out the window. It's raining outside, and the drops are splashing against the glass like tears. I feel like I'm drowning in my own grief.

I can't believe Olga is gone. She was my best friend, my confidante, my everything. We were supposed to grow old together, to raise our kids together. But now she's gone, and I'm all alone.

I don't know how I'm going to go on without her. She was the light of my life, and now she's gone. I feel like a part of me has died with her.

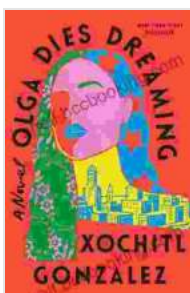

I take another sip of my rum and close my eyes. I can still see Olga's face, her smile, her eyes. She was so beautiful, so full of life. I can't believe she's gone.

I open my eyes and look out the window again. The rain has stopped, and the sun is starting to shine. I take a deep breath and stand up. I have to go on. I have to find a way to live without Olga.

I walk over to the window and open it. The fresh air fills my lungs, and I take a deep breath. I'm going to be okay. I have to be. Olga would want me to be happy.

I smile and close my eyes. I can hear Olga's laughter in the wind. She's with me, always."
