As the family and their guide hiked deeper into the Notch, the weather began to change. The sky darkened, and the wind picked up. Soon, a torrential downpour began to fall. The family and their guide were caught in the open, and they had nowhere to shelter from the storm.

The storm raged for hours, and by the time it finally subsided, the family and their guide were exhausted and lost. They had wandered off the trail, and they were stranded in the wilderness. As night fell, the temperature dropped, and the family began to suffer from hypothermia.

One by one, the members of the family began to die. The guide was the first to go, followed by the children. The parents held on for as long as they could, but eventually they too succumbed to the cold and the elements.

In the morning, only one member of the group was still alive: an eight-year-old boy named Samuel Willey. Samuel had managed to survive by huddling close to his mother's body for warmth. He was found by a search party, and he was taken back to civilization.
