The Visionary Behind the School

Katharine Gibbs was born in 1863 to a prominent New York family. From a young age, she exhibited a strong intellect and a passion for education. Despite facing resistance from her traditionalist parents, Gibbs pursued her dreams and became one of the first women to graduate from Miss Spence's School for Girls.

Gibbs's first-hand experience of the limited opportunities available to women during the late 19th century ignited a fire within her. She realized that women deserved the same educational opportunities as men and that secretarial skills could be the key to their economic empowerment.

The Birth of the Katharine Gibbs School

In 1911, with a mere $300 and an unwavering belief in her mission, Gibbs founded the Katharine Gibbs School in Boston. Her initial class consisted of just 14 students, but her reputation for excellence quickly spread, and the school expanded rapidly.

Beyond Secretarial Education

As the Katharine Gibbs School flourished, Gibbs's vision expanded beyond the realm of secretarial education. She recognized that women needed broader business skills to thrive in the rapidly changing economy.

In 1923, she introduced a two-year associate's degree program, which included courses in accounting, business law, and journalism. She also established partnerships with universities and colleges, allowing her students to pursue further education and career advancement.

A Legacy of Empowerment

Throughout her life, Gibbs remained an ardent advocate for women's empowerment. She served on the board of the National Woman's Party, campaigned for women's suffrage, and established scholarship programs to support aspiring female students.
